The aim of Metamedicine is to provide a forum for interdisciplinary studies in the philosophy and methodology of medical research and practice. Particular attention is paid to heuristic approaches developing new methods and tools for a better understanding and analysis of the conceptual presuppositions of the medical sciences and health care processes. Special points of interest are the application to medicine of the advanced methods of the philosophy of science, logic, and mathematics; the study of problems of medical language, knowledge acquisition, and theory formation in medicine; the development of the philosophy and methodology of clinical judgment and clinical decision-making; the analysis of the structures and dynamics of medical hypotheses and theories; the discussion and clarification of basic medical concepts and issues; the study of the interplay between medicine and other scientific or social institutions.
